Not illustrated. 1838 edition. Excerpt: ... in. SOLUTION OF THE COSMOLOGICAL IDEAS OF THE TOTALITY OF THE DEDUTION OF THE EVENTS OF THE WORLD FROM THEIR CAUSES. We can only imagine two kinds of causality in respect of that which happens, either according to nature, or from liberty. The first is the connexion of a state with a preceding one in the sensible world, whereupon such state succeeds according to a rule. Now as the causality of phenomena rests upon conditions of time, and the previous state, if it had always been, would still have produced no effect, which first of all arises in time, causality of the cause of that which happens or commences, has thus also commenced, and again requires itself, according to the principles of the understanding, a cause. On the contrary, I understand by liberty, in the cosmological sense, the faculty of beginning of oneself a state, the causality whereof, therefore, does not stand according to the laws of nature, again under another cause, which determines it according to time. Liberty is in this meaning a transcendental idea, which, firstly, contains nothing borrowed from experience, and the object of which, secondly, can be given determined in no experience, since it is a general law, even of the possibility of all experience, that everything which happens must have a cause: consequently also the causality of the cause, which itself has happened or arisen, again must have a cause: whereby then the whole field of experience, however far it may extend, is changed into a complex of mere nature. But, as in such a way no absolute totality of the conditions in causal relationship is hence to be obtained, reason thus creates for itself the idea of a spontaneity, that might begin to act from itself, without that another cause need be premised, to...
