Excerpt: ... LECTURE LXVII. Of the history of Great Britain, from the commencement of the reign of Anne in the year 1702 to that of George I. in the year 1714. WILLIAM had, j ust six months before his death, attained a great object of his policy, in forming the second grand alliance between Great Britain, the empire, and the Dutch states. The public mind had been brought to a persuasion, that the dearest interests of the country required a strenuous and persevering opposition to the ambition of France; and the Tories, not less than the Whigs, were compelled to seek popularity by manifesting a disposition to give effect to the prevailing anxiety for war. The death of James II, which occurred on the da y War with France Scottish Union. Treaty of Utrecht 1702 1707 1713 Somervilles Hist. of Polit. Trans. p. 677 &c. preceding that, on which the treaty was concluded, furnished a new and powerful excitement to the national ardour, by giving occasion to the court of France to acknowledge his son as the king of England. All who were anxious for a protestant succession, were by this measure rendered devoted enemies of France, and even many, who were secretly attached to the exiled family, were alienated from their cause, when the son of James had accepted the patronage of the formidable enemy of their country. The succession of the family of Hanover became accordingly from this time the object of every party. The Tories were so deeply engaged in this rivalry of attachment to the Hanoverian interest, that when, in the succeeding reign, some of their leading men were disposed to favour the inclination of the queen for the succession of her brother, they were forced to pursue their object by means so clandestine and inconsistent, as frustrated their purpose, and brought ruin upon...
