Not illustrated. 1863 Excerpt: ...open the great book in her lap, and showed them the pictures. The first was a picture of the shore, with the fishermans house upon it, and the boats fastened in their places. Rocksy and the baby were playing upon the beach. Lucy had supposed that the book was a printed Dook, while Mary Jay was reading; but while she was looking at the picture, she found that it was written with a pen. The picture, too, was not a printed picture; it was painted,--in beautiful colors. After the children had looked at this picture long enough, Mary Jay turned over the leaf, and showed them another. It was a view of the interior of the fishermans cottage at night. It looked dark, only there was a little blaze of fire upon the hearth, which flashed about the room. Rocksy was asleep, with her head upon the cricket and her hand upon the cradle The children looked on a moment in silence; and at length Mary Jay said, Was not she a good, faithful, trustworthy Yp-s, indeed, said all the children. CHAPTER VIII. ROYALS STORY. One day, when Lucy was about five yeais oid, she was sick. She was not very sick,--only a little sick, just so that they could not let her go out of doors. Lucy looked out of the window for some time, to see them get in the large yellow pumpkins from the garden. Then she played with her picture-books a little while. After that, she did not know what to do. She came and stood by her mother, who was sewing. And she said, Mother, I wish I knew what to do. And her mother said, I think you had better lie down upon the sofa a little while, and go to sleep. But Lucy said, O mother, I am not sleepy; I am only tired of not having anything to do. Then her mother told her that, if she were to lie down upon the sofa, sh...
