D. 1254. Iott^e now behold Ibeg A. H. 652. W seated avowedly upon that throne which he had long and ardently coveted. Scarcely had he arrived at this dignity, when he married Shajir al Dor, whose favourite and regent he had formerly been. Success appeared to have woven for him a garland of triumph and peace ; but the prospects of the world are often falacious, and success begets disquietudes, which frequently embitter the sources of enjoyment. Seated upon the height of the Egyptian throne, the first sultan of the Baharite race discovered new ob Bba jects which engaged his heart ; and among these was the beautiful and accomplished daughter of the king of Mossul. What right had Shajir al Dor to complain of his intention to marry another wife ? It wag a practice which the religion of Mohammed allowed; and she had herself been only one of a number of wives, whom the sultan Nojmoddin received into his seraglio. But admiration and power had made her impatient of contradiction, and she could not bear a rival in the affections of her husband, or the admiration of the court. Moreover, she was well aware how much it had been owing to her influence and friendship that Ibeg himself had risen into notice, and acquired the chief command of the state. Void of suspicion, the sultan was going, as usual, to indulge in the bath; but the revengeful sultanness had prepared his doom; and assassins, rushing upon him unawares, instantly put him to death. His body was brought into the palace, and laid at the feet of Shajir al Dor ; but the humiliating sight produced in her no emotion of anguish...
