

Euthyphro

The argument of the Euthyphro dialogue is based on definition by division. Socrates goads Euthyphro to offer definitions of piety. The purpose of establishing a clear definition is to provide a basis for Euthyphro to teach Socrates the answer to the question: What is piety? Ostensibly, the purpose of the dialogue is to provide Socrates with a definitive meaning of piety, with which he can defend against the charge of impiety in the pending trial. Socrates seeks a definition of piety that is a universal (universally true), against which all actions can be measured to determine whether or not the actions are pious. That, to be universal, the definition of piety must express the essence of the thing defined (piety), and be defined in terms of genus, species, and the differentiae. Hence, the Euthyphro dialogue is technically important for the dialectics of theology, ethics, epistemology, and metaphysics. Indeed, Platos approach in this dialogue is anachronistic, because it is unlikely that Socrates was a master metaphysicist; nonetheless, Aristotles expositional treatment of metaphysics is rooted in the Platonic dialogues, especially in the Euthyphro.
