Protogenes is said to have lived in comparative obscurity at Rhodes till the fiftieth year of his age, when his merits were made known to his fellow-citizens through a visit of Apelles. Protophytes to organisms in the vegetable kingdom, consisting either of a single cell or of several cells united by a gelatinous substance but without any essential mutual dependence, and corresponding to the Protozoa of the animal kingdom. Protoplasm (Prtto-plarai), subt stance consisting of carbon, oxygen, nitrogen, and hydrogen, nearly identical with the white of an egg, and constituting the most elementary living matter in animal and plant structures. It is colorless, transparent, and apparently destitute of structure, and is seen in its simplest form in some of the lowest types of animal life, as in the Protozoa. When unrestricted by an imprisoning envelope it is endued (as is seen in Amaba diffluent) with the power of extending itself in all directions in the form of mutable processes which can be withdrawn spontaneously, and it has also the power of passing or flowing in minute masses through closed membranes without these masses thereby losing their identity of form. In the form of cells, the kin Protornis Prout of which is merely dead and hardened and, except in the higher forms, they have protoplasm, and enclosing a nucleus, or no differentiated mouth, the food being with a nucleus embedded in its substance, simply absorbed. From this fact the it is the structural unit of all organized Protozoa have been divided into those that bodies, constituting not only the basis of

have a distinct external mouth and those the ovum of both plants and animals, but th...
